A populist party must emerge if the extent of voter disappointment caused by insecurity exceeds the cost of creating a party, which depends on context-specific variables. Clearly, they support each other. Economic insecurity must therefore be the main factor explaining the presence of populist parties. The people's disappointment with the elite lends credibility to the demand Author, D, D Dorn, G Hanson and K Majlesi (2017). "A note on the effect of commercial exposure on the 2016 presidential elections." MIT working document. The effects are substantial: increasing the share of votes for the populist party by a standard deviation (16 %age points) reduces the gap between the non-populist platforms and the general populist platform by 33 % of the sample average. Colantone, I and P Stanig (2016), "Global Competition and Brexit," Bocconi University, Working Paper 2016-44. Before describing how we study the demand for populism given the aforementioned methodological concern, a word about the data. 23285. The effect of confidence in political parties on participation has a similar force: a drop in confidence of 5 %age points reduces the chances of participation in the elections by 8.8 %age points, almost 11 % of the electoral turnout unconditional average. Figure 1 Economic insecurity, trust and feelings Notes: The figure shows dispersion diagrams and linear regressions of change in economic insecurity (x axis) and change in trust in political parties (y axis, left figure) and attitudes towards immigrants (y-axis, right picture) in the panel of synthetic cohorts. References Acemoglu, D and P Restrepo (2017), "Robos and Jobs: Evidence US work markets, NBER working document no. It is a global change in the preferences of voters, which is by new political leaders entering politics? We then summarize these three objective measures of financial and economic distress into a single index of economic insecurity, taking the first main component, resized so that it varies from 0 (lowest insecurity) to 1 (highest insecurity). We capture this with three measures. Guiso, L, H Herrera, M Morelli, and T Sonno (2016) But their discovery of a weak direct effect of economic variables is due to the fact that they cannot see that economic security shocks significantly affect the incentive to abstain, which is instead the key intermediary channel we emphasize in our research. Those who have more adverse attitudes towards immigrants are less likely to participate in elections and more likely to vote for a populist party if they choose to participate. Rodrik, D (2017), "Populism and the Economics of Globalization" (CEPR DP 12119) We also show that populist parties choose their orientation by strategically leaning to the left or the right, depending on the relative importance of the left- or right-type cleavages weighted by the percentage of left- and right-oriented voters. Lixo man et al. Economic insecurity has two sides: it discourages participation and increases the possibility of voting for a populist party among those who decide to exercise their right to vote. Foster and Frieden (2017) nuance this result by using individual characteristics from the Eurobarometer survey data, and also show how the link between mistrust and populism is most pronounced in debtor countries. Our research establishes that the effects of disillusionment and abstention, neglected in literature, make economic insecurity seem to be the real engine of populism on the demand side. Unlike the articles in this literature that ignore the At the polls, we can see the mechanism through which economic insecurity works. The voting intensities are important for voters who choose to participate in the election. The important point to point out is that it is improbable that a measurement is well captured the voters themselves to the economic insecurity. Algan et al. The Rites and Limits of the Theory of Rational Choice, University of Pittsburgh Press. It is well documented (see, among others, the comprehensive work of Blais 2000) that the incentives are participated positively on income and age, the confidence in the political system and education; They depend negatively on the perception of the unsustainability of new policies. (2017) Study the policy consequences of the great recession in Europe, documenting that, in the elections P'S-2008, the EU regions with higher unemployment gave more support to populists. It is this margin that, in our interpretation, creates the basis for the emergence of populist platforms. These are substantial effects. What are the main engines of populism supply? Various studies have addressed the question of populism recently. With this measure, we are agrats about the specific factor that causes the insecurity. We address these issues, based on our investigation into populism's propagation in Europe (GISO et al. Our main source of individual data is European Social Social Rite (ESS) , which survey the attitudes, beliefs and patterns of voting behaviors of European citizens. We think that, in all questions, the distance decreases after populist parties gain consensus "like populist parties gain support, parties do not seem to adapt their platforms to reduce distance e e inillebaT G .ripas A .nettO S .neergnehcE B .C .naamtsuD .odiddecus meb atsilupop oditrap ZOEGA (2017). DA © Ficit of Confidence of Europe: Causes and Remits, CEPR Press. The supply of populist parties of populism is not always present. While the shock of globalization generates a demand for populist policies, Rodrik emphasizes the importance of understanding simultaneously the side of the offering of populism - specifically, the chosen orientation of the populist parties, which he argues It reflects the relative salion of specific clivage induced by the shock of globalization. In the year 2000, less than 70% of the European matters had a populist party; At the year 2009, they all had at least one (although in the last years of the sample that had disappeared from some paan). This had not been the case in the past: the crisis in the 1970s was mainly a crisis in the market, while the vain crises in the 1990s were government crises, in a time when markets were thriving. The rare combination of markets and the inability of governments to guarantee the eco -man security has shook the trust in traditional political parties and institutions, facilitating an increase in fear, aggravated by other threats, like mass migration. Concerns about the emergence of populist movements are dubbed both in paan that face protests against inequality and capitalist institutions and in paan where there is increasing support from the natives of the threats of threes. of immigration and globalization. Algan, y, s guriev, and papaioannou and passari (2017). eThe crisis of European confidence and the rise of populism. Brookings papers on economics activity, fall. There are a cultural channel in people who vote for populism and people who abstain, but not a cultural cause - the cause is the economic insecurity, which also changes the beliefs and attitudes. In addition, the same effects of disappointment/abstention determine the time and number of populists on the side of the offer. It tracks the origin of populism today (especially if back to the shock of globalization, arguing that the past history and 1 also The theory implies that waves of globalization can predictably lead to a populist reaction with a specific moment (when the shock reaches) and geographical pattern (in paan that is most negatively affected by globalization). Inglehart, R F (1997). Modernization and Puhodemization: Cultural change and POLYTICAL CULTURAL CHANGE IN 43 societies, Princeton University Press. But these variables are, their own, driven by the econhamic insecurity. In a recent article, we documented how this double global crisis affects the demand and offering of populism systematically, and we argue that a key to understanding both the demand and the offering of populism is the effect of insecurity about the participation Electoral (GISO et al. Therefore, populist voting preference is positively correlated with the abstention. For example, if a poetic does not dispute a populist controversy proposal by emphasizing its future costs , the populist challenger may claim that this concern is actually driven by the personal interest of the elite. Using panel data (pseudo), we show that the people who experience an increase in the eco -dollar insecure. Fan © In Polyums and develop more adverse attitudes regarding immigrants (see Figure 1). 2017), but also other forces that may have been at work, including obsoxcies of specific work skills , Work displacement caused by the rapid automation (acemoglu and re -recreation 2017), or lasting disturbances in the personal sparaps and capacity for income generation caused to the financial crisis. Regarding the supply of populism, we complemented the data of ESS with other data sets, such as the World Bank's policy database and World Bank Wits Statostices (Un Comtrade). We also document that the participation in the voting and voting of a populist party is also affected by two variants. People's policies and adverse attitudes towards immigrants.
